News you can Use

The Bank of Japan decided to start selling its holdings of risky assets and two board members voted against keeping interest rates steady, suggesting the bank would phase out its massive monetary stimulus sooner than first thought. While the central bank kept short-term interest rates at 0.5%, board members Hajime Takata and Naoki Tamura proposed, unsuccessfully, a hike to 0.75% in a move markets saw as a prelude to a near-term increase in borrowing costs. The hawkish shift surprised markets and put investor focus back on how soon BOJ will next raise interest rates, even as uncertainty over the global outlook and domestic politics grows. "Real interest rates remain very low," BOJ Governor Kazuo Ueda said in a press briefing after the decision. "If our economic and price forecasts materialise, we will continue to raise interest rates in accordance to improvements in the economy and prices." At the two-day meeting that ended on Friday, the BOJ decided to sell its holdings of exchange-traded funds (ETF) in the market at an annual pace of around 330 billion yen ($2 billion).

The number of Americans filing new applications for unemployment benefits fell last week, reversing the prior week's jump, but the labor market has softened as both the demand for and supply of workers have diminished. Though the report from the Labor Department showed fewer people collected unemployment checks in the last week of August, that was likely because many had exhausted their eligibility, which is limited to six months in most states. The hiring side of the labor market has almost stalled even as layoffs remain relatively low. Demand for workers has slowed, with economists blaming uncertainty stemming from tariffs on imports. Nonetheless, economists welcomed the decline in applications as a sign of the economy's resilience. Initial claims for state unemployment benefits decreased 33,000 to a seasonally adjusted 231,000 for the week ended September 13. Claims in the prior week had jumped to 264,000, a level last seen in October 2021. The claims data covered the period during which the government surveyed business establishments for the nonfarm payrolls component of September's employment report. Claims fell slightly between the September and August survey weeks.
